

Honestly not sure this is going to work

Hi —

I'll be straight with you, because my leadership is asking hard questions and I don't have good answers.

We put the AI support agent live three weeks ago. It demoed beautifully. In production it's a different story. It gives customers confidently wrong answers. It misses things a junior rep would catch on day one. Last week it told a customer their issue was "resolved" when it flat-out wasn't — they found out the hard way, and that one landed on my desk.

My team is losing trust in it, and honestly so am I. The question I keep getting from above is whether we bet on the wrong model — or whether we should pull this now and go back to humans before it does more damage.

Before we spend another dollar on it, I need someone to tell me straight: is this fixable, or did we build on tech that isn't ready? And if it's fixable, I need to be able to explain to my leadership what was wrong and why the fix works — in plain English, with something I can actually show them.

I've given you access to the system and one ticket that went badly (T-4471). Tell me what you find.

Priya
